

I think that the nation should require a national curriculum to an extent rather than I am a curriculum that might take the entire year so for example the state should or the nation should ensure that students are all learning particular skills algebra or geometry or um world history but that doesn't mean that individual districts wouldn't have room to decide how that instruction is received by the students if you live on the water way you might want to do more with that kind of the water trade when you're talking about economics versus if you lived in a state that was heavy into farming or something so I think that the nation or a national curriculum could be useful if it's dealing with skills and if it's broad enough that it allowed individual districts to provide and the instruction anyway they saw fit
